Ravi was a humble woodcutter who lived in a small village at the edge of a dense forest. Every morning, before the sun rose, he would walk into the woods with his axe slung across his shoulder. Unlike many others who chopped down trees for quick profit, Ravi believed that the forest was a gift of nature and had to be treated with respect. He never harmed young saplings or healthy trees. Instead, he collected only fallen branches and dried logs, ensuring that the forest remained green and alive.

One summer afternoon, while resting under the shade of a banyan tree, Ravi noticed a small bird struggling on the ground. Its wing was injured and it could not fly. Moved by compassion, Ravi carefully picked up the bird and carried it home. For several days, he fed it, cleaned its wounds and kept it safe until it regained its strength. When the bird was finally well, it flew away into the forest. To Ravi's surprise, the bird returned after a week, carrying a shining gold coin in its beak. From that day, it often brought him little treasures.

The story of Ravi spread quickly in the village. People admired him not just for his good fortune, but for his honesty and kindness. They realized that true wealth does not always come from hard work alone, but also from the goodness of one's heart. Ravi's life became a reminder that kindness, when given freely, always finds its way back.
